Prosecution Asks Judge To Throw Out B.C. Airline's Spying Suit A B.C. airline has been fighting a privacy suit brought by the B.C. government for more than three years, claiming it is guilty of unlawful spying and the current case should be thrown out. The case of Civil Liberties Association of Canada v. Canadian Imperial Airways and Air Canada against C-I-A and Air Canada has been ongoing since 2008. It involves C-I-A, Air Canada, a B.C.-based airline and the RCMP, and is a case that pits the court's belief in privacy against free speech. In 2007, the C-I-A — an airline that flies to 26 international destinations from Vancouver and other British Columbia cities — began flying its employees and business travellers back and forth between Vancouver and its headquarters in Montreal, Ont., and to its hub in Toronto. Air Canada also began offering the service. The service allows C-I-A and Air Canada to track the movements of their employees and business travellers, so they can better manage their workforce, as well as their operations, using their proprietary database. Those in charge of this computerized database — which stores data on roughly 1 million users — have access to the data and can see at a glance where their employees are travelling, where they are staying and how long they spend there, for example. Privacy concerns In the suit, the C-I-A, Air Canada and the RCMP have maintained that using the database is necessary for business purposes. But the C-I-A, which describes itself as "Canada's flagship airline," has argued it is simply keeping 82157476af
